Enter any electronics or home good store, and you'll find there is no shortage of kitchen appliances that claim to be several things in one, but they rarely work out. The electric opener with the wine cork remover never works as well as the dedicated tool, and I honestly feel ashamed of how many times I've fallen in love with this. My kitchen is not particularly large, so the space is top quality, which is difficult for someone who loves to explore new ways of cooking. With the world being positively overrun by multipurpose pressure cookers right now, Ninja caught my eye with his new Foodi kitchen system. In addition to offering a pot at full pressure, is it also an air fryer? It sounded too good to be true, but after a little extra research, it quickly became clear that this is a real multipurpose cooking system that is worth a place in my kitchen. Literally two machines in one. Ninja offers a high-end pressure cooker and a decent air fryer on the same gadget, with extremely simple instructions for switching from one cooking mode to another. For those eager to save some space in the kitchen, this is the way to go. Easy to use Easy to clean Parts No shortage of accessories Constantly offers the same experience There is no way to store parts you are not using No automatic modes for simple cooks I grew up with a pressure cooker on the stove. My mom was great at making a big batch of ribs or some broccoli soup cream with an amazing taste and not long. The popularity of pressure cookers these days makes me super happy and knowing that this has happened because modern technology has made them safer is fantastic. I love the way a modern pressure cooker will blow up an alarm when something is burning at the bottom of the pot, or the pressure doesn't hold. Computers have taken pressure cookers and simplified microwaves when it comes to things like eggs or steaming vegetables. The difference in taste or how fast you can cook makes all the difference in the world for families on a tight schedule or budget. The pressure cooker mode on the Ninja Foodi is similar to the others you'll find on the market today. Insert a pot into the larger cooking bowl, fill it with the things you want to cook, and then use the front panel to adjust the temperature and cooking time. It is a very simple system, but much safer to use than the pressure cookers of yesteryear. You just have to follow the look for a fun recipe, and start experimenting. You can choose between the standard 6.5-room pot model or the largest (and most expensive) 8-room model for larger families. And, unlike most other electronic pressure cookers, both models come with a ceramic-coated pot instead of making you pay extra for it. The ceramic coating makes it significantly easier to clean, as it food does not adhere to that surface as easily as stainless steel or aluminum does. I can make a whole complex meal on this appliance and have minimal cleaning when I'm done. That's all it makes it worth it to me. Like an independent electronic pressure cooker, the Ninja Foodi is quite large. You could easily combine a pressure cooker and a slow pot into a single gadget for most people and be a great overall experience. However, if you remove the ceramic pot and take the other lid you will find in the box, this pot will also work as an air fryer. By adding a fan system to the heating element, Ninja can do it so you can fall into an air fryer basket and cook everything from frozen foods to whole chickens. Because air fryer technology does not depend on boiling cooking oil, the resulting foods are generally considered healthier than alternatives. That doesn't mean you can't add a little oil for the flavor or even put some meat on top of the vegetables, so the drips fall and get soaked in the other things you're cooking. It is another level of control in the kitchen, and again generally safer to use than a traditional oil fryer. It is worth noting Ninja has been extremely friendly with third parties in making accessories for the Foodi already, which is great. A quick search revealed third-party steam diverters, silicone slings to easily transport hot pots around the kitchen, and even cake pans so you can bake directly into this pot. Ninja itself makes a lot of other accessories as well, including a skewer stand and additional airflow means less traditional cooking techniques. In that short collection, I learned at least three other ways to cook with this thing that I would never have bothered to think about otherwise. Being so friendly to other accessory manufacturers, Ninjas has made sure that a vibrant community of home cooks will share all kinds of recipes just for this thing. And believe me, they do. Easily my favorite thing about the whole Ninja experience is creating here is the ease with which you can clean up the whole thing. The ceramic-coated pot, for when you're pressing or cooking slowly, can be poured directly into the dishwasher. In addition, the air fryer mode is very easy to remove when you finish using it. The two lids included in the package are also easy to clean, which is essential when you're like me and try to make several meals a week in a pressure cooker and don't have a ton of time. I can make a complete and elaborate meal in this appliance and have minimal cleaning when finished. That's all it makes it worth it to me. Ninja Foodi What could be Out of the box, Ninja gives him enough. Where your average electronic pressure cooker will have a single lid and maybe a steam tray, the Foodi comes with two huge lids and several other necessary accessories. You must be able to store parts that you are not using separately. You can't fit everything into the Foodi when you're not using it. Y Y box itself does not include a great way to store any of these accessories safely. I would have preferred a cloth box of some kind for these extra parts, so when they're not in use, I don't have to worry about it getting dirty. If I don't use the air fryer mode for a couple of months, for example, because it's summer and I'm going to want to be on my grill instead, I'm going to need to sterilize that lid before using it because it's not in a protective case of some kind. Ninja's Foodi cuisine has demonstrated the ability to do many things very well, which is quite unique in this space. I also don't like the interface on the front of the Ninja Foodi too much. While Ninja gets all the credit in the world for adding security features to great cooking techniques and offering a simple interface to get started, the overall experience is a little poor. I can set a temperature and an hour, but there are no automatic presets for things that will always cook in exactly the same way. Eggs are a perfect example; I love cooking eggs in a pressure cooker because it better separates the membrane and makes removing the shell a little easier. That's why, in many electronic pressure cookers, there's only one button for eggs. It's almost like a microwave popcorn button, but there are no quick preset buttons on the Ninja Foodi. Instead, I've found myself looking for more generic recipes and taking note of temperature averages so I can figure out a quick fit that I can make for myself. This is fine, all things considered, but not as straightforward and easy to use as many competitive pressure cookers right now. This is not a real complaint as much as an observation, but it would also be great if Ninja differentiates himself by making these available in a few colors. All electronic pots are glossy black or silver with black accents. Stand out, Ninja. Be bold. Get some color options here. I would love a deep blue for this thing that I plan to use all the time and present clearly in my kitchen for the world to see. If this gadget is going to be as important to me as my stand mixer, it should have a bit of personality as my bright blue support mixer. Ninja Foodi: Is this for you? I think there are a ton of electronic pressure cookers on the market today, some with much more name recognition than others. But what makes any of these right for you is the way you're going to use it, and that includes frequency. If you're an informal home cook and you're enjoying the novelty, you may get more excited than the features. If you don't have much confidence in your skills as a home cook, you may prefer comfort than things like raw power or a total of Ninja's Foodi cuisine has demonstrated the ability to do many things very well, which is quite unique in this space. By adding a functional air fryer in a way that can function as a standalone device when you have it configured that way, this becomes more about and the comfort of cleanliness than anything else. Air fryers can be extremely useful when they are powerful enough to cook big things, and this is exactly that. And if you're struggling to find space on your counters for multiple quality gadgets, being able to consolidate into one device is extremely valuable. Literally two machines in one. Ninja offers a high-end pressure cooker and a decent air fryer on the same gadget, with extremely simple instructions for switching from one cooking mode to another. For those eager to save some space in the kitchen, this is the way to go. Editor's Note: We're excited to get our hands on the Ninja Foodi, so keep your eyes open for our full review soon!
